Cytogenetic tests in the diagnosis of occupational exposure to low doses of ionizing radiation. Cytogenetic studies are widely used to assess exposure to radiation. For the purpose of radiation protection, the International Commission on Radiation Protection divides the dose from 0.1 to 10 mSv into five categories (A to E). The biological endpoints in these categories are analyzed in the framework of a "dose-response model". The aim of the study was to assess the sensitivity of cytogenetic testing by a human lymphoblastoid cell line to the endpoints of a dose-response model. In addition, the influence of changes in the method of irradiation on the dose response were investigated. Erythrocytes of 11 radiation workers chronically exposed to radiation in the range 0.5-9.8 mSv during their work were examined by a conventional chromosome aberration test and a micronucleus test. The radiation workers were also examined by the same methods after a 30-day period of absence from their workplace. The results of the tests in the 11 workers showed a significant dose-response relationship for chromosome aberration frequency and micronucleus frequency ( $r = 0.68$  and  $0.77$ , respectively). The results of the tests in three of the 11 workers also showed a significant dose-response relationship for the micronucleus frequency and the chromosome aberration frequency. No significant differences were observed in the frequencies of chromosome aberrations after 1 year and after 3 months ( $P = 0.109$ ) and in the frequencies of micronuclei after 1 month and after 3 months ( $P = 0.114$ ). Analysis of the dose-response relationships for the three cases and the results of the tests on untreated lymphocytes exposed in ba244e880a
